

Dear Jovan Tadic,

we do not invent rules, just because we like rules. The meaningful questions behind the rule of presenting version numbers in the title is, whether the method you are publishing here, will be modified in future, e.g., by additionaly features or by bug fixes. If so, it will become important in the future to know, which version was used for the production of published results. Therefore we require version numbers in the titles of the articles.

The fact, that other articles in the past did not provide this version number is no argument at all, because

1. the three articles have been published before our Editorial 1.1 was published. Thus at that time is was not an established rule that version numbers must be given.
2. Even if the articles would have been published afterwards, the fact that our enforcing failed in the past is not a valid argument to prevent following this rule in the presence.

Best regards,
Astrid Kerkweg (Executive Editor)
